

A cold breeze filled the air as darkness consumed the sky, sounds of absolute agony and distress were the only ones which could be heard. Without a doubt I was afraid none of the people that surrounded me were recognizable, my parents and everything I knew had now completely disappeared like dust on a windy day. I felt alone as I drifted into an ice cold slumber ...

Bright beams of golden sunlight penetrated my eyes as I came to the realization that day time had now arrived. Endless the blue sea was presumed to be until now, land was viewable in the far distance. Cries of felicity filled the agonizing silence and we had now successfully infiltrated the beaches of the unknown land; all I wanted to know was where my mother was as I finally departed from the overcrowded boat. "Mamma" I bellowed into the unrecognizable distance.

BANG,BANG!

Deafening noises

pierced through freedom's cheers consequently causing an unwelcomed return of disastrous memories; cases which pieced the clouds setting off explosions that decapitated the people I once knew and loved. I was unable to comprehend the murderous scenes that appeared before me. Within seconds I was dragged back on to the boat by men carrying guns thus sending a shiver down my spine. Once again my travels on the not so endless sea began.

With disappointment, we once again sailed along the sea; not one word was murmured nor spoken but you could still hear their cries no matter how silent they were. Waves of blue shades splashed the boat like we were now at war with the sea and not just our fate. My hope drowned in the sea as we now floated aimlessly along the obstreperous enemy. Tears of the slate-gray sky began to fall, the icy-cold tears infiltrated my clothes which now caused an uncontrollable dampness to devour the dryness that encompassed me. "Why me?" I despairingly question the unforgiving sky...

Thud! Suddenly my eyes opened with shock; we had arrived once again at a new unrecognizable place. Cautious movements were made by everyone nearby so I followed. Our arrival was welcomed quite contrastingly than our previous one. Food, water, clothes, towels and blankets were all prepared for us. Cheers of felicity once again filled the air however they did not belong to me for sadness still plagued my mind. I could not see her, my mother was still unable to be located. Despairingly, I dropped to my weak knees which was soon followed by a comforting embrace. It was my mother...

